

A method for manufacturing ingots includes placing in a mold of inserts with doping or modifying components, which are then melted, filling the mould with liquid metal. The inserts are used in the form of individual elements and secured at specified parts of the mould, namely in the areas of hazardous duty operation or possible destruction of an ingot.